"Why President Trump Earns My Respect"

I come from Papua New Guinea - a Christian nation where faith, family, and responsibility are not abstract ideas, but lived realities. That lens shapes how I judge leaders. Not by charisma. Not by headlines. But by whether they defend the moral foundations that keep civilizations standing.

Donald Trump does.

He understands something many Western elites have forgotten: government is not God. In Scripture, authority exists to restrain chaos, reward good, and protect what is entrusted to it - not to replace faith, erase family, or redefine truth for political convenience.

Strong nations are built on order, not confusion.

On families, not fragmentation.

On borders, not open-ended surrender dressed up as virtue.

Under Trump, Christianity was not treated as an inconvenience to be managed or a threat to be neutralized.

Faith was respected.

Parents mattered.

Work mattered.

Moral responsibility mattered. Society was not told that strength was toxic or that obedience to timeless principles was oppression such as the value of motherhood.

That matters to people like me - because when the West abandons its values, the consequences don't stay in the West.

The Bible speaks clearly about stewardship. You protect what you're responsible for. A nation that refuses to guard its borders, its workers, its resources, and its moral order is not compassionate - it is negligent. And negligence always invites disorder.

Trump rejects the ideology of globalism because globalism dissolves accountability. It asks nations to sacrifice their people, their industries, and their sovereignty to unelected interests that answer to no culture, no faith, and no moral standard. That model weakens America - and when America weakens, the entire Western framework weakens with it.

A strong America means a stable West.

A stable West means balance in the world.

And that balance protects smaller nations like Papua New Guinea from being economically, culturally, or strategically swallowed by powers that do not share our values.

This isn't about worshiping a man. Scripture warns against that.

It's about recognizing leadership that chooses principle over applause.

Trump is not polished. He is not perfect. But he is honest about the battle - and he refuses to call moral decay "progress" or national surrender "enlightenment."

You don't need to be American to see what's at stake.

Without faith, family, order, and sovereignty, no nation endures.

Without a strong America grounded in those principles, the world becomes far more dangerous for everyone else.

That is why I respect President Trump - not as a celebrity, but as a leader who understands that values are not optional, and that when the foundations are destroyed, the righteous have nothing left to stand on.
